Stirling House:

A Landmark of Innovation and Heritage

Originally designed for the Ministry of Defence by architects Barber, Casanovas & Ruffles, Stirling House opened in 1995. Its striking design – glass centre, twin sloping roofs, and four turrets – reflects the site's rich military heritage as part of the former RAF Waterbeach, once home to Bomber Command during WWII.

The building takes its name from the Short Stirling, the first four-engine British bomber of the war, which flew from Waterbeach between 1941–43.

RAF Waterbeach played a vital role from 1940 onwards, hosting Bomber, Transport, and Fighter Command until 1962. The Royal Engineers took over in 1966, with 39 Engineer Regiment based here until 2013, supporting operations worldwide.

A museum was later established to preserve the site's legacy. In 2012, the Waterbeach Military Heritage Museum was formed to continue this mission, with hopes for a permanent home in the future development.

Today, Stirling House remains an iconic part of the landscape, blending history with sustainability as it's retrofitted with eco-friendly systems in line with plans for a carbon-neutral site.

With new planning permission granted for three new buildings, Cambridge Innovation Parks is entering its next exciting phase of development — expanding thoughtfully to offer more high-quality, future-ready office space. This growth supports our mission to create a premium destination for ambitious businesses, while honouring the site's rich heritage and committing to a sustainable, carbon-neutral future.

Future Growth Ambitions

Growth

Planning permission has been granted for three new office buildings at Cambridge Innovation Parks, marking a major step forward in our commitment to sustainable growth. These new spaces will offer modern, energy-efficient work environments designed to meet the needs of today's dynamic businesses. This expansion directly supports our mission to deliver high-quality workspaces, support tenant growth, and firmly establish the park as a leading mid-size office destination in the Cambridge region

Infrastructure

The neighbouring Waterbeach New Town development, which will deliver over 11,500 new homes and a vibrant new town centre, brings significant long-term benefits to Cambridge Innovation Parks. As major infrastructure enhancements take shape – including improved transport links, new amenities, and upgraded utilities – our site is perfectly positioned to benefit. This transformation supports our mission to offer a premium, well-connected office destination, ensuring our tenants enjoy not only high-quality workspaces, but also access to a thriving, future-proofed community designed for sustainable growth and modern living.

Renovate

Planning permission has been granted for the sustainable retrofit of Stirling House at Cambridge Innovation Parks. This initiative aims to modernize the former Ministry of Defence building by incorporating energy-efficient systems and eco-friendly materials, aligning with the park's commitment to reducing its carbon footprint. The refurbishment will enhance the building's functionality and environmental performance, providing tenants with a contemporary, sustainable workspace that supports innovation and growth.
